Introduction:

The number of adults with son form of Congenital Heart Disease (CHD) is growing rapidly as therapy becomes increasingly effective. Some of these patients have only disease with relatively little need for medical care but others have complicated problems and require the service of an array of people with great expertise in the field. To assess the needs for care for these patients, we need first to determine the incidence of CHD as a group and of the individual major congenital heart lesions. This determination is usually incomplete, and there is substantial variation in the estimated incidence of CHD. The reasons for this variation will be examined as the current best estimates for incidence will be provided.

Definitions:

Incidence refers to the number of new affected persons per unit of time or populations. Prevalence refers to the number of present at any time and represents the difference between the incidence and those who die in the same period. The incidence of CHD is usually estimated by calculating the number of subjects with CHD per thousand or per million live births. Sometimes these numbers are collected in a region over one year, but at other times the data for several years may be combined for some purpose it is useful to calculate the incidence in a country per year. Congenital Heart Disease, in a definition proposed by Mitchell is a gross structural abnormality of the heart or intra thoracic great Vessels that is actually or potentially of functional significance. This definition excludes dysfunctionless abnormalities of the great veins, such as persistent left superior cava (even though this might be important doing surgery) or of the branches of the aortic arch such as a combined branchiocephalic left carotid arterial trunk. It usually excludes congenital arrhythmias such as the long QT and the Wolf Parkinson. White syndromes, even if the disorders are based on abnormalities present at birth, Lesions such as hypertrophic or dilated cardiomyopathy are usually not regarded as CHD. Even though the abnormal genes that cause these disorders are present at birth, the Cardiomyopathy is rarely detected at this time but usually presents later in childhood or adolescence. Another genetically determined lesion, Marfan syndrome, is often included as CHD because the phenotype may be present at birth, although because the cardiac and aortic lesions may not appear for many years not all studies include this syndrome.
